Story: Building of special Bailey Bridge.

When the Canadian Army advances to the Rhine river, the job if bridging it will fall to the Royal Canadian Engineers. Already experiments are under way with a bridge, similar to the many which will be thrown across the river. There are many difficulties in this connection and an entirely new method will be employed. The early stages of this Bailey Bridge are entirely the same as the hundreds which have been built across France, Belgium and Holland, but a new method of driving piles, either steel or wood, into the river bed will be used. The pile driving apparatus will be located on the end of the bridge and when sufficient piles are driven in a pier will be erected and the whole bridge moved onto this one. More bridge will be built on the land and the bridge pushed out again and more piles driven into the river bed. The bridge moving will be the same again and more piles will be placed and so on until the bridge is completed from one shore. The same procedure will be used on the other shore and then the center span will be erected and put into place.

These are preliminary pictures of the experimental bridge and others will be made later as the work of experimenting with various methods and piles continues.

44386 - This is an end view of the bridge where workmen build on new pieces to the bridge.

44387 - An end view of the bridge from the shore side.

Story: Photographs of used and new tyres - as requested.

Thousands of new tyres pass through Ordnance Depots for vehicles of the Cdn Army. Used tyres and those from damaged vehicles, or still others from change in equipment, are also handles through a returned stores depot. Here the tyres are brought in and sorted and those which cannot be put to immediate use are shipped back to England for remelting.

The new tyres are housed and kept at a brick kilm in long low buildings which are camouflaged almost beyond recognition. There are no large tyre dumps where thousands of tyres are piled on top of each other as this would be unwise should their be an air raid and a hit was scored on the dump.

Story: Special on Bailey Bridge.

(NOTE: Additional material to go with Roll 102, 23 Dec 44)

When the Cdn Army advances to the Rhine river, the job of bridging it will fall to the Royal Cdn Engineers. Already experiments are under way with a bridge, similar to the many which will be thrown across the river. There are many difficulties in this connection and an entirely new method will be employed. The early stages of this Bailey Bridge are entirely the same as the hundreds which have been built across France, Belgium and Holland, but a new method of driving piles, either steel or wood, into the river will used. The pile driving apparatus will be located on the end of the bridge and when sufficient piles are driven in a pier will be built on the land end and the bridge pushed out again and more piles driven in to the river bed. The bridge moving will be the same again, and more piles will be placed, and so on, until the bridge is completed from one shore. The same procedure will be used on the other shore and then the centre span will be erected and put into place.
